Is a label just a label?

Dangerous goods labeling: compliance, durability and risk.

At first glance, a dangerous goods label may seem just like another label on a package. It's much more than that.

Why labels matter?

Every dangerous goods label protects people, supports compliance and keeps dangerous goods moving safely through the supply chain.

By road, rail, sea or air, the correct label gives handlers, carriers and emergency responders the information they need to identify hazards and take the right precautions.

What goes wrong?

1. Shipment delays
2. Carrier rejection
3. Regulatory penalties
4. Transport risk

That's why choosing the right label - and the right supplier - is an important part of your compliance strategy.

Built for demanding environments

Dangerous goods labels must survive the whole journey.

- Moisture
- Chemicals
- UV Light
- Temperature
- Abrasion

Marine grade materials

Legible after prolonged sea water exposure

If a label fades or detaches in transit, critical safety information is lost.

Compliance is more than durability

Every label must meet the transport regulations for its mode - correct dimensions, colours, symbols, wording and layout.

Regulations evolve, and labels must evolve with them. A supplier who tracks those changes keeps you compliant without adding work for your team.

When reviewing your dangerous goods labeling, ask:

- ☐ Are your labels compliant with the latest transport regulations?
- ☐ Do dimensions, colours and symbols meet the required standards?
- ☐ Will the materials survive the environments your products face?
- ☐ Can your supplier provide consistent quality and technical expertise?
- ☐ Are you confident your labels will last the whole supply chain?

More Than a Label – The Trident Advantage
